She walked where the wild things wander,
Where the sky stretches wide and clear, Where mountains hum low and steady and the rivers draw you near.
She followed the call of open roads, of forests deep and free.
Of wind that whispers softly through every rooted tree.
She lived with a spirit untethered, an adventurer at heart, finding beauty in each new dawn, in every journeys start.
Now she's gone where pain can't follow, where the air is always light, where trails go on forever beneath a golden light.
So when you hear the rustling leaves, or feel the suns warm glow, that's her - still out there wandering, in every place we go.
Free as the breeze she cherished, she's at peace where she longed to be, forever part of the wild, forever running free.
