"He Feels Everything"

By: Frank Doherty

He may not say much, but he feels everything, The weight of the world, the love he can't sing. Long hours, tired eyes, footsteps near, Every sacrifice says, "I'm right here." And though he never says it loud, You can hear it in the way he stays around. A quiet strength, a steady hand, A kind of love we sometimes don't understand. He may not say "I love you" with words, But in the silence, his heart is heard. Through every long night, through every storm, A father loves in ways that keep us warm. Not always soft, not always bright, But love like his never leaves our side. Maybe he was strict, maybe he was tough, Maybe speaking feelings never felt enough. But every time you lost your way, He was the one who always stayed. We forget that fathers carry weight, That they break, that they pray, that they hesitate. But they still show up, through the highs and lows, Because that's the love a father knows. He may not say "I love you" with words, But in the silence, his heart is heard. Through every long night, through every storm, A father loves in ways that keep us warm. Not always soft, not always bright, But love like his never leaves our side.
